There are men at the bottom of the world in a mountained solitude making something out of living in spite of the things that would make them uncomfortable things. MacLean and his men.

SURVIVAL

By CHARLES SAXBY
ILLUSTRATED BY DUDLEY GLOVE SUMMERS

IT WAS somewhere up in the vast regions that MacLean finally ran his last mile to safety.

As he approached safety, he lay down to rest in a small cave. He had been so tired that he had fallen asleep. He had been so tired that he had fallen asleep. He had been so tired that he had fallen asleep.

Now, with the storm of the storm ship at hand, he had to get up again. He had to get up again. He had to get up again. He had to get up again. He had to get up again.

MacLean's men were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him.

THE first impression was surprise. After weeks of waiting for the men to return, they were back. They were back. They were back. They were back. They were back.

Between the postpartum surprise of an expedition of packed men which sought to conquer Antarctic wastes and the return of a lone survivor of a better defeat, there lies a story that explains why men survive at all.

A study told in the MacLean magazine, and quite the best thing in the world, and quite the best thing in the world, and quite the best thing in the world.

Life after 100 years? MacLean began. "You know the story," he said. "You know the story, and you know the story, and you know the story."

MacLean said, a moment, and MacLean's men were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him.

MacLean said, a moment, and MacLean's men were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him. They were waiting for him.
